THE Pacific Mail Company expect, if the subsidy bill now before congress is passed, to get the China & Japan Mail contract, in which case they intend to tun the Canadian Pacific hard. The Pacific Coast manager recently said to an interviewer, in reply to the question what changes would the subsidy bring about :- Well, there are rumors already affeat from the home office that the present steamers plying between San Francisco and China will be succeeded by others capable of making faster time. The improvements in naval architecture within the past ten years have been marked, and the company is only too anxious to gather them together in the construction of new steamers, provided sufficient inducements are held out. The steamers we now That 'up we go and down we come' is one use will probably be run in the southern coast service between Acapulco and Panama. THE SIGNAL MAN ON THE MID-

Upon the intelligence, fidelity, London, July 8 .- A girl 12 years of age and physical condition of this vast army has been violated and murdered in Man- ! dopend the lives of the multitudes who are churia, Mongolia. The body of the victim constantly travelling by tail. Any sudden was shockingly mutilated after the manner and serious disability happening to one of of the victims of 'Jack the Ripper' in Lon- ; them may result in a disaster which would put hundreds of families in mourning. Accustomed as it is to safe and swift conveyance from point to point, the public scarcely realises this fact. The following brief narrative, which is strictly true, will therefore be read with interest :--On the Midland Railway, twenty-three miles south of Carlisle, there is a little station called Culgaith. Here there is signal-box in which Signalman Andrew Agge is to be found on duty daily. As is the case with all other signal boxes, this one contains the levers and the usual complicated electric and mechanical contrivances for making and receiving signals. Mr Agge is on duty nearly every day, and takes his luncheous without leaving his post. He is a sturdy man of thirty-five, in good health, and no complaint has ever been made against him by the public; yet an incident occurred a few years ago that came near depriving him of his position and his life, For some time he had not felt well, the worst and most dangerous phase of his in-disposition being a kind of giddiness that would sei e him unexpectedly and, as he described it, ' set everything to moving and twisting round and round. The dector told him frankly that it was a symptom of a still more radical complaint brought on by too much confinement, and by his irregular habits of eating and sleeping, and that he had better abandon his work for a while, and try a change of scene.

But this was casier said than done. had a family to support, and couldn't afford the luxury of a vacation. He knew no other business, and could not risk the loss of his place. His work was always done, however, no matter how he felt. But it is only fair to say he had many auxious hours over it. His ailment, which he had discovered to be judigestion and dyspepsis, now set up more alarming symptoms. A physician at Appleby assured Aggo that there was serious trouble with his kidneys and bladder. 'It is,' said the doctor to the Signalman, the result of the condition of your digestion. Your blood is poisoned by your atomnoh, and every organ of the body is crippled by it." This was a miserable outlook for Agge, who went back to Culguith with small courage for his work. He took hold, though, as well as he could, and kept it up until one morning several weeks afterwards. He was in the box as usual when of sudden a sharp pain shot through him as though he had been stabled with a knife. He tumbled down on the locker in the signalbox, and lay there all the forenoon in aoute distress and agony. For the time his work was a secondary consideration. Unable to remain in that position any longer, he laid down and rolled on the floor. The pain in his hips and back was so intense that he compared it to being out with dull knives, and pierced with hot irons, Agge was alone when the attack came, and as nobody except railway officials are allowed in the signal boxes, it was some time before his plight was discovered. Finally, however, the atation-master came in, the neighbours were summoned, and the soffering man was put into a trap and taken to his house, half a mile away. There he was ill for weeks, part of the time unconscious. When the physicians had avowedly got to the end of their resources it was agreed that the Signalman's end was only a matter of a very little time. This was the situation when a singular thing happened. Two or three years before, while Agge was feeling the earlier symptoms of his disorder, he had taken a medicine that helped him; getting better, he put the bottle aside, still half full, and forgot it altogether.

Now, as he was almost in a dying condition, his memory flashed up one day, and he distinctly recalled where he had put it. A search was made and then it was found. The prostrate Signalman began using it and, to the astonishment of neighbours and doctors, in a few days was able to get out of doors. We may mention that the medicine was the well-known preparation, Mother Seigel's Carativo Syrup, although to advertise the article is not the chief motive for this little narrative. As a matter of fact, Signalman Agge kept on doctoring himself with it, and it cured him, be its nature what it may. He went back to his box long ago, and this incident is printed in order that the reader may know more of the character and experience of a large and faithful body of public servants.
